Memorial for Leo M. Loll read by Charles Clutts from KUAC news

Unknown date

Charles Clutts talked about the loss of Leo Loll, vice president at the University of Alaska Fairbanks. He made this a better place to live. He was not just a dean who became a vice president he was fast becoming an institution and a legend. He was a leader in the community as well as the university. Charles tells a story about Dean Loll interacting with a student. He had a genuine interest in all who came to the university. He always took time with those he met on the street. He liked to talk about his family especially his son, Scott. He took an interest in the interaction of the community and the university. There was an editorial in the Daily news-miner about his death in a plane crash near Barrow. He was a nationally known financial and investment authority. He co-authored two books. He had a key role in establishing the Alaska review of business and economic conditions. Alaskan businesses and tax payers are indebted to Leo Loll. He was dean of the College of Business and Economic Development before his appointment as vice president of the university. He was involved in civic endeavors and was appointed to the governor's Employment Advisor Commission. He was in Alaska for a relatively short time but many have been enriched by the presence of Leo Lull. The Alaska flag song is played.
