

2000-78-65

University of Alaska Fairbanks students talk about what they like about the university

Interviews with students: Anne (from Norway) and John Terry

unidentified interviewer

1980s

Series: University focus

University of Alaska campus in Fairbanks, Alaska

Unidentified interviewer said they are ready for a voice check.

Anne reads the introduction material about the university. The university has grown dramatically from its first days as the College of Agriculture and School of Mines. Today more than 5,000 students select from a full gamut of academic fields. Our recommended fields of study. Our graduates are working on every continent throughout the world using skills they learned at the University of Alaska Fairbanks.

Anne talked about the place she is from in Norway.

Take 1.

The interviewer asked what were the primary reasons you came to the University of Alaska Fairbanks. Anne said the primary reason was the ski team. She is a cross country skier and was offered a scholarship. She thought it would be very much like home as far as the climate. She said she likes it. The interviewer asked what she liked about the university. Anne said there is a lot of cultural diversity. She talked about the quality of her education. She said she is studying in a foreign language. She has very good professors. She would recommend UAF to other students because it has a lot to offer. There are people from many parts of the world. She said there are a lot of things going on in Fairbanks. If you are an outdoor person there isn't a better place than Alaska. She talked about why she would recommend the university to others. She feels she is getting a quality education because of her well educated professors. She feels people are different and friendly at the university. The best part of going to university for her is enjoying the outdoors in Fairbanks.

[00:09:40] An unidentified student reads the introduction material about the University of Alaska Fairbanks, the different schools at the university, sports and cultural offerings at the college as well as information about the Fairbanks region.

[00:16:00] John Terry reads the introduction material about the university.