University of Alaska Fairbanks students talk about what they like about the university

Interviews with students: Todd King, and Jan.

Unidentified interviewer

1980s

Series: University focus

University of Alaska campus in Fairbanks, Alaska

Todd King talked about why he would recommend the University of Alaska Fairbanks. If someone was interested in coming to the university he would tell them you will have to want to learn and grow. He said he has evolved and grown since coming to the university. He said there is a great diversity of people on campus. He said this creates an atmosphere of learning. He said he doesn't have much for comparison, but he came to the university after two years in a community college. He said he had to read and study every night once he came here. He feels the classes are more difficult and there is more required. He feels he has had a great education.

[00:05:58] Jan reads the introduction material about the university.

[00:20:10] The interviewer asked an unidentified student about her experience coming to the university. Jan said when she first entered the university she used the services at the Rural Student Services. They helped her with financial aid and class selection. She feels the instructors were very helpful. She talked about the reasons she would recommend the university to others. She feels it isn't a very large university and there are places on campus willing to help the student from rural areas. She feels the university helps the rural student adjust to life on campus.
